this book explores the experiences of rural communities who lived between the seventh and ninth centuries in central and eastern england combining archaeology with documentary place name and topographic evidences it provides unique insight into social economic and political conditions in middle saxon england the authors consider the siting of thorps and throps in relation to the landscape and to soil types in particular amply demonstrating the value of an interdisciplinary approach to the study of early medieval settlement in england the authors are able to draw important conclusions about the changes in farming that swept the country during this period and by association the process of village nucleation by examining both the chronology of place names in thorp and throp and their qualifying elements notably the presence or absence of personal names it appears possible to chart both the speed at which arable enterprises farmed in severalty converted to communal cultivation as well as the direction in which the changes spread there is a sense of real excitement as many fresh insights are revealed in the course of the book p 4 of cover why is the countryside in some parts of england and continental europe dominated by large villages while in many regions looser groupings of houses in hamlets or isolated farms provide the main forms of settlement the answer lies in the period c 850 1200 when the settlement pattern which still survives

was created

examines the effect of fluctuations in climate on agriculture and settlement of northern regions this volume presents preliminary results of excavation at the late iron age oppidum settlement of kelheim the volume is divided into four main sections the first explains the reasons for investigations at kelheim the second presents the results of the excavations regarding both settlement features and artifact distribution the third includes special studies of several categories of materials as well as discussion of the chronology of the occupation and presentation of the results of the landscape survey the final section addresses some major questions about late prehistoric europe from the perspective of these excavations and the analytical results it presents investigations into ritual behavior in the kelheim region and uses this theme to argue for strong continuity of tradition from prehistoric times into the middle ages the initial aim of the research from which this book arose was to place the romano british villa at gorhambury near st albans hertfordshire within the context of the resources which it might have exploited and the economic organisation for which it was a focus what resulted was a much wider history and reconstruction of the gorhambury landscape itself this study of six parishes in the st albans area presents an analysis and measurement of the changing landscape from the pre medieval and medieval periods to the early modern examining such themes as settlement field systems land use and administration
